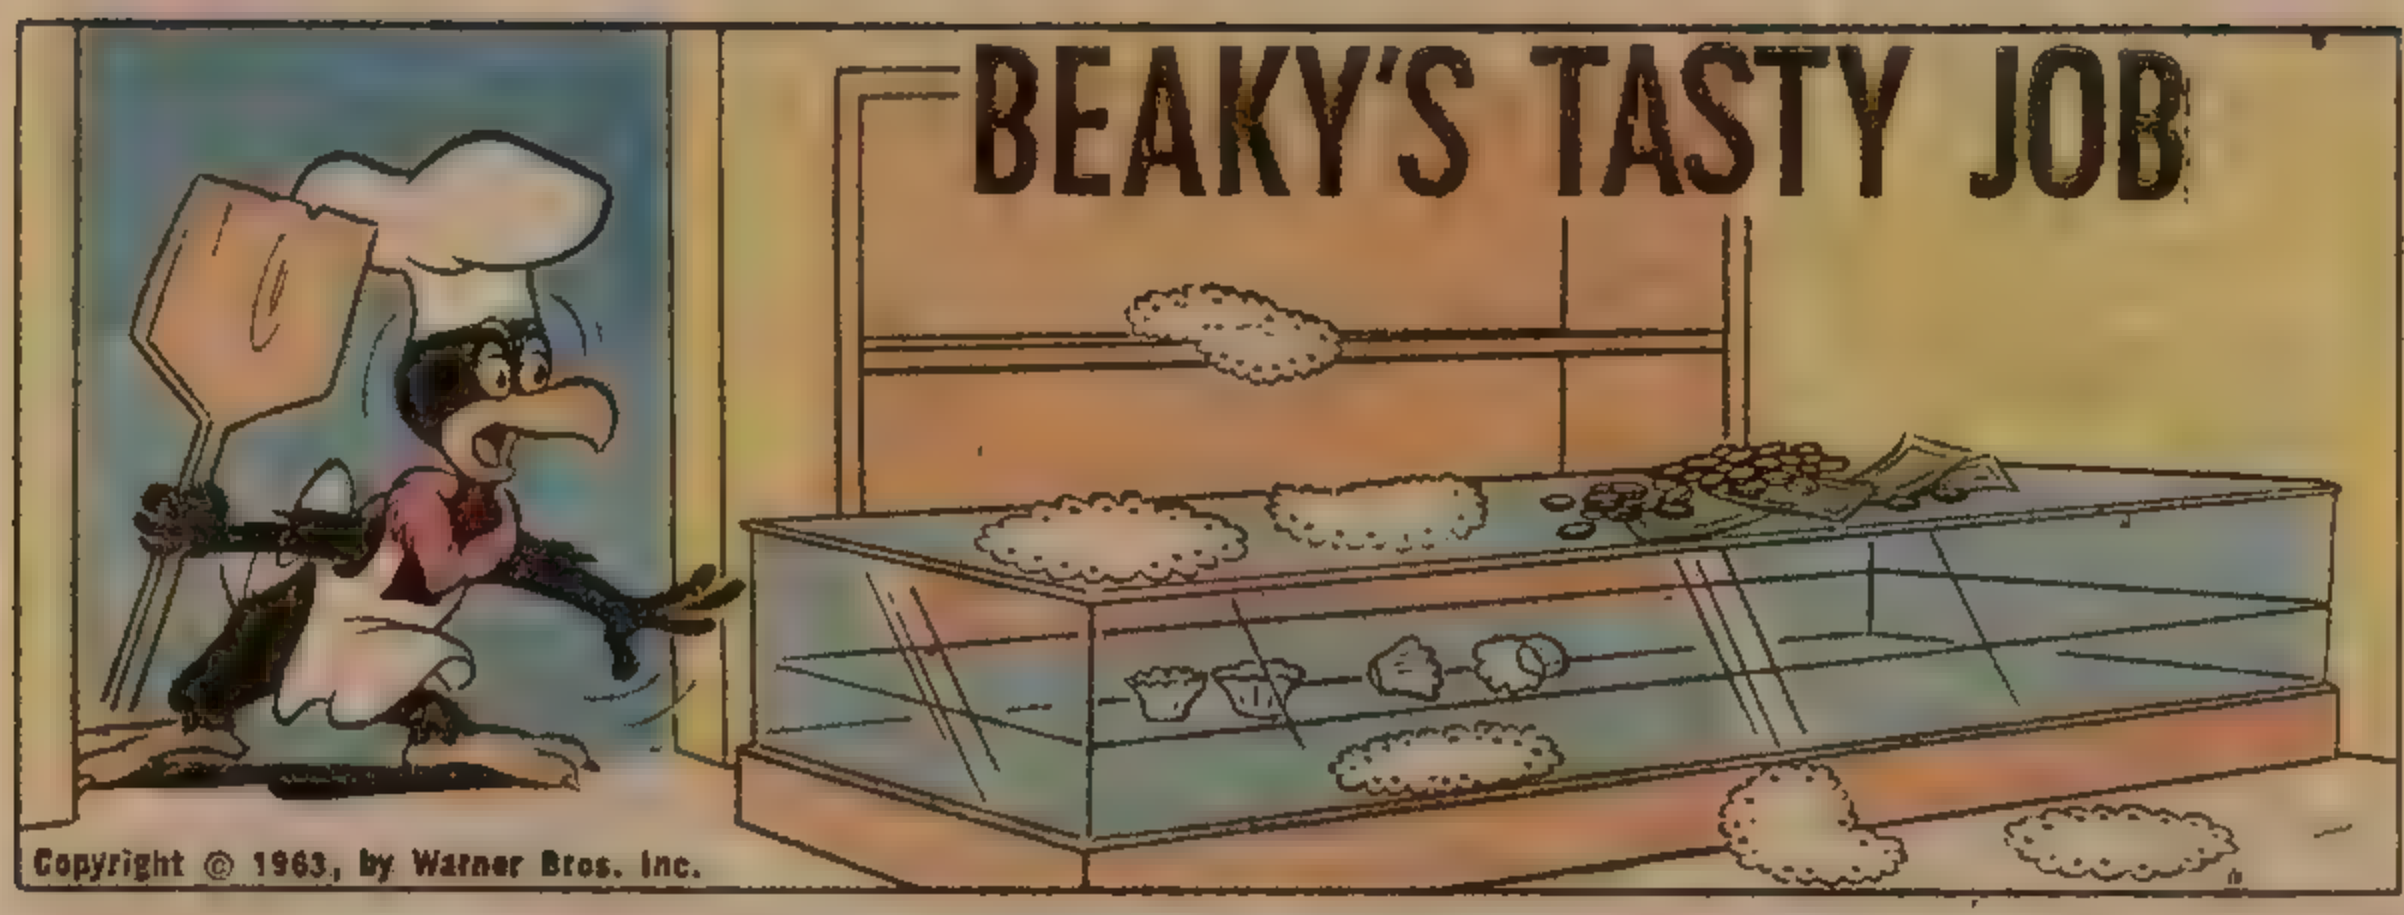
The End



One morning, as Beaky Buzzard ambled past the bakery shop, Mr. Mixit, the baker man, called out to him, "Beaky! Oh, Beaky! Will you come in a minute, please?"

"Glad to, Mr. Mixit," replied Beaky, his nose twitching at the delicious smells.

"Would you mind the bakery for me today?" Mr. Mixit asked, taking off his baker's cap and apron. "I have urgent business downtown this afternoon."

"Uh — well, sure, Mr. Mixit," answered Beaky, "but I can't make those yummies."

"Oh, you won't have to make anything," Mr. Mixit assured Beaky. "Everything is done, except some bread in the oven. In half an hour, take it out with this," and Mr. Mixit pointed to a long-handled shovel.

"Gawsh," said Beaky, "yuh mean I don't get to even lick a frosting bowl?"

"You can lick my frosting bowls anytime," Mr. Mixit laughed. Then, hurrying out, he said, "I'll be back later."

"Well," thought Beaky, munching cookies, "I bet no one ever had a tastier job."

Just then, Beaky's first customer came in. Pointing to a big layer cake, the lady asked, "How much is that cake?"

Beaky looked at the cake a moment. Mr. Mixit had not told him the prices of the bakery wares, so Beaky made a guess.

"I — uh — I think just about thirty-five cents," he said.

"Really?" asked the lady, delighted. "I'll take it." Then pointing to a big cream pie, she asked eagerly, "How much?"

"Well, now," said Beaky, "that pie looks like about forty cents to me."

Laden with her purchase of goodies, the lady left and spread the word . . . the bakery was having a wonderful sale! Soon Beaky found the place full of women, eager to buy the cakes and pies and cookies. Beaky looked at them in bewilderment. And then a bell rang to tell Beaky the bread in the oven was done.

"You'll have to wait on yourselves," Beaky said, running to shovel the bread out of the huge oven. That accomplished, he looked into the front of the store . . . it was empty. Every cake, cookie, pie, and loaf of bread was gone! Quarters, dimes, and dollars lay on the counters!

"Well, well," thought Beaky, "I didn't know it was that easy to sell stuff."

When Mr. Mixit returned, he exclaimed, "I don't understand it! I never sold that much bakery goods in one day in all my whole life!"

However, Mr. Mixit understood, when he counted the money in the cash register.

"I should have three times this much money," he groaned. "You must have given the stuff away!"

"I'm sorry," said Beaky.

"It's not your fault," said Mr. Mixit. "I should have told you the prices. I guess all the ladies just thought I was having a great big sale!"

The next day, when Beaky stopped to see Mr. Mixit, he found the baker all smiles.

"Beaky," he said, "it's wonderful. Because of your sale, lots of people bought things they had never tasted before, and now I have a long list of special orders!"

Mr. Mixit set a chocolate frosting bowl before Beaky, adding, "Yes, Beaky, you have the makings of a good salesman."

"Uh—I don't know about that," answered Beaky, slurping the frosting leavings, "but I sure have the taste for the makings!"
